What Makes an Injury Catastrophic?

A catastrophic injury is defined as an experience that has an enduring negative impact on the person involved. Typically, such injuries lead to permanent disability, affecting the victim's ability to earn money, engage in social activity, or otherwise enjoy their lives. Such injuries may include back injuries, loss of eyesight or loss of hearing. Injuries leaving persistent psychological damage may also qualify, especially if they lead to permanent mental illness. The consequences of catastrophic injuries extend beyond the victims themselves. Their loss of income, medical needs, and limited mobility can place a burden on their friends and loved ones, requiring them to sacrifice time, effort, and money helping with their recovery. Compensation for catastrophic injury is thus necessary not only for the victim's sake but for that of everyone in their lives.

Common Catastrophic Injuries

Injuries severe enough to be considered catastrophic usually fit into one of the following categories:

- Amputations: Amputations of limbs or other extremities often make it impossible for the victims to work, leading to the complete loss of income. Even victims who can work often require extensive physical therapy or costly prosthetics. Such injuries also frequently lead to phantom limb syndrome and other psychological maladies, requiring counseling.
- Spinal Cord Injuries: The spinal cord connects the brain to the rest of the body, making it indispensable for motor function. 12,000 Americans suffer spinal cord damage a year, usually the result of back and neck trauma. This can cause permanent paralysis, limiting the victim's ability to work, exercise, or otherwise remain mobile.
- Broken Bones: Although a single broken bone can usually be restored in a matter of months, multiple fractures are harder to recover from. Such injuries often lead to permanent reductions in strength and mobility, as well as persistent pain.
- Vital Organ Damage: Serious injuries can puncture or traumatize your heart, lungs, and other internal organs. Not only does this severely impair your body's functions, but it leads to additional problems later in life.
- Burns: Burns that severely damage your skin or that extend to large areas of your body cause nerve damage, disfigurement, and chronic pain.

- Brain Injuries: The most serious form of catastrophic injury, brain damage affects 1.7 million Americans every year. The more severe the trauma, the greater the chance of permanent mental and physical impairment.

Causes of Catastrophic Injuries

Catastrophic injuries can result from any number of mishaps, including:

- Automotive Accidents: By far the most common source of catastrophic harm, automobiles can be involved in collisions, rollover accidents, fires, and a variety of other perilous accidents. Severe harm is especially likely in accidents involving pedestrians or motorcyclists, as well as when the automobile is a semi-truck.
- Fires: Whether they occur in buildings, cars, or public spaces. Fires cause not only damage skin, but can also cause limb circulation issues and skin contracture that may limit mobility. Inhalation of the products of fire can cause an internal burn to the bronchial tree and lungs. This manifests by hypoxia, acute respiratory distress syndrome, and even respiratory failure
- Falling: Falling accidents often cause catastrophic injury, especially if the victim fell from scaffolding, a ladder, or another great height.
- Sports: High-intensity contact sports like football are a frequent source of head and spine injuries.

When another parties' actions contribute to these injuries, you deserve redress for the damage they have caused.

What Can I Be Compensated For?

If you can prove that someone else caused your catastrophic injury through negligence or deliberate harm, you deserve compensation for losses and damages that can be recovered through a successful claim. Compensation may include:

- Medical Costs: This includes the long-term cost of rehabilitative treatment for your injury, as well as the price of any prosthetics or rehabilitation services you need.
- Financial Losses: If you are unable to work as a result of your injury, you are entitled to current and future wage loss.
- Suffering: Physical pain and mental anguish can lead to sleep deprivation, a loss of focus, and long-term mental health issues. You should be compensated for these ailments and the counseling you need to recover from them.
