Construction sites can be dangerous -- even to pedestrians. What happens if you're injured by a forklift at a construction site when you're just walking by? Due to operator error, forklifts can fall over or push debris onto you. Forklifts that are carrying a too heavy load can tumble, directing heavy items towards people around them.

If you are a pedestrian who has been involved in a forklift injury accident in California, our experienced personal injury lawyers are here for you. We don't charge any legal fees unless we successfully settle or win your case.

California Pedestrian Injured at Construction Site Laws

When you're injured by a forklift, you can be left with some substantial medical costs . You may lose time at work or have long-term physical damage. Someone will need to be liable for these costs; otherwise, you're going to end up paying them out of your own pocket.

Construction companies have insurance to deal with exactly this type of issue, but that doesn't mean they will immediately pay out. Their ultimate goal is to save themselves money and to avoid any liability issues. Further, you will need to show who was ultimately liable for your accident, and often this requires showing specific acts of negligence.

How Are Pedestrians Injured by Forklifts?

Up to 25% of forklift accidents are caused by improper training. If employees are improperly trained on safety protocols, they can easily cause damage to pedestrian, and the company may be found liable for this. However, improper training isn't the only type of negligence commonly found in forklift accidents. Forklift accidents could also occur due to mechanical failure of the forklift itself, which would lead to a product liability issue. In this case, it would be the manufacturer who might be liable for any accidents.

Finally, a forklift accident could also occur due to general negligence around a construction site, such as improperly marked areas and additional safety hazards. All of this would need to be revealed through a thorough investigation, which legal professionals can assist with.
