Lead poisoning is a life-threatening condition in which the body has absorbed excessive amounts of lead. Lead may be inhaled or swallowed in contaminated food, water, and air. Lead poisoning affects people of all ages, but infants and children are especially vulnerable.

Symptoms of lead poisoning vary, but may include:

- digestive system issues
- impairments of the brain and nervous system
- developmental problems in children

The EPA reports average lead levels vary across the state of California, with San Francisco County having lead soil levels of well over twice the EPA's limit

Who is liable for lead poisoning injuries?

Many people may be liable, including:

- business owners
- public facilities such as schools
- construction companies
- landlords
- plumbers

If you're renting out your home or a renter, you should be aware of laws surrounding lead paint and household pipes. If the house was built before 1978, the homeowner needs to ensure that there isn't any lead-based paint in it. Additionally, during the renovation of a pre-1978 home, steps must be taken to contain lead-bearing dust and paint fragments. In terms of plumbing, all pipes that provide water for human consumption must be lead-free.

What about product liability? According to the California Health and Safety Code, children's toys have very strict limits on the trace amounts of lead they can contain. Shop owners need to verify that the toys they stock are compliant with that code.

Product liability may extend to other items as well. If a product contains lead, clear warnings should be placed on the label. If an employee must work with items or materials that contain lead, they must be given adequate training and safety gear.
