Severe Weather as a Major Factor

A pile-up generally occurs on high-capacity and high-speed highways and freeways. In general, a single or two car accident can easily turn into a major vehicle pile-up with factors like dangerous weather conditions causing low visibility and drivers following too closely. With little formal research in the US to show statistics regarding cause, it can be difficult to determine negligence in such cases. Severe weather is a common contributor to multi-car crashes.

Who is at Fault in a Chain-Reaction Collision Event?

Determining liability in a multi-car crash can be complex because law enforcement investigators need to establish details for every vehicle involved and consider the weather conditions at the time of the accident. Factors that help determine liability include driver speed, driving too close or other careless actions behind the wheel. The investigating police officer can assign fault or insurance adjusters will negotiate for the most advantageous solution and determine the percentage of fault for each negligent driver. When the fault is determined, an experienced multi-car collision attorney will make sure you get the maximum compensation for your medical expenses, vehicle damage claim and pain and suffering.
