General Aviation Accidents

The category of general aviation aircrafts include all privately owned airplanes utilized by the public for personal or business use. General aviation is governed by different federal regulations than commercial or military aircraft. The majority of planes in this classification are single-engine, propeller-driven planes like the Cessna 172, Cirrus SR20 or the Piper PA-32. Twin-engine airplanes and private jets, flown by more experienced pilots, also fall into the general aviation category. Litigation for small aircraft accidents may involve many different legal issues, so it is imperative to choose legal representation by an experienced injury lawyer to efficiently work with investigating officials and insurance companies.

Commercial Airliner Accidents

The Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) in the United States enforces regulations for commercial airlines, airport operations, and aircraft manufacturers to ensure the safety of your flight. Airline accident victim's claims can fall under many jurisdictions like:

- International Travelers – If any leg of your journey includes international air travel, legal claims for plane crash injuries or fatalities will be governed by The Montreal Convention, The Hague Protocol or The Warsaw Convention.
- Beyond 12 Nautical Miles from US Shores – the Death on the High Seas Act may limit personal injury and wrongful death claims. However, amendments to this act over the years, now address both financial losses as well as non-economic damage recovery for a commercial airline tragedy victim's family.
- Within the United States – Aviation law in the US falls under the oversight of the FAA and will also include applicable state laws consistent with federal mandates. Aviation law practice includes legal actions for plane crash survivors' injuries and on behalf of families who have suffered the loss of a loved one as a result of an airline accident.
